Simplified English for Japan, .-Hon. Arrino Mori, Charge d' Affaires of Japan, residing in Washlugton, sometime last summer addressed a letter to Prof. Whitney of Yale College, on the important subject indicated in the foregoing caption. This letter has but recently found its way into print, and cannot but attract no little attention among our philologists.

Mr. Mori states that the spoken language of Japan Mr. Mori states that the spoken language of Japan is inadequate to the growing necessities of the people of that empire, and too poor to be made, by a phonotic alphabet, sufficiently useful as a written language. In view of this fact, the best educated men and thinkers of that country are coming to see the necessity, if they would keep pace with the age, of adopting some copious, expansible and expanding European language, for the printing of the laws and the transaction of public business, which language they would have tanget in their schools as the future language of the country, to the gradual exclusion of their own language, written and spoken. (The written language now is use in Japan, it may be well to state, has little or no relation to the spoken language, but is mainly hyaroglyphic—a modification or corruption of the Chinese.)

The English language, Mr. Mori says, would be their first choice for very many reasons; but there their first choice for very many reasons; but there are certain obstacles, of an intensely practical charlarge number of irregular verbs.

Now Mr. Mori states his purpose to be (in which he has the concurrence of his countryman) to prepare and place in the schools of Japan, and in the pare and place in the schools of Japan, and in the hands of the people at large, spelling books, diction-aries, grammars and other text books, teaching what may be termed "simplified English." In other words, he proposes to banish from the English language, for the use of the Japanese nation, all or most of the exceptions which render English so difficult of acquisition, even by English-speaking people, and which discourage most foreigners who have the hardihood to attempt to master it from persevering to success.

Thus, for instance, he proposes to substitute, as rate, for instance, he proposes to anostrinte, as past tenses and past participles, seed for saw and seen, speaked for spoke and spoken, bited for bit and bitten, teached for taught, beared for bore and borne, thinked for thought, buyed for bought, comed for came and come, and so on through the entire list of irregular verbs.

In spelling, he proposes to complete what all English and American lexicographers commenced but timidly abandoned; that is, establish a uniform rule of spelling words according to their sound. Thus he would make the principle which recognizes "iancy," "convey" and "deceit" as the correct spellings of those words, apply, also, to "phantom," inveigh" and "receit," which he would spell "fantom," "invey" and "receit."

Mr. Mori bas undertaken a big job, but one in which he is entitled to the assistance and trigodic which he is entitled to the assis co-operation of our people. - San Jon Mercury.

Obituary.

Died in Honolulu on Saturday, March 8th, 1873, Doctor C. S. Halle, of Alameda, California, aged about 26 years. On the 5th of last month he left an aged mother, a young and intersibly for the benefit of his health, but in reality "to die among strangers in a strange land," for he was in the last stages of physicians to advise, or even to allow, without remonstrance; their patients in the last stages of any fatal disease, to lea comfortable homes, and the bearest and dearest of earthl comtortable bosses, and the nearest and dearest of earthly ties, under the thin proteinse, that a change of climate will benefit them, when every physician of any standing in his profession must know that the fatigue of a sex-voyage, and the enervaling effects of a tropical climate, must accessfully tend to hasten the death, instead of prolonging the life, of those who are beyond the power of ourthly remodies. Such was Doctor Haite's case—he lived just three weeks after his arrival in this city. was Doctor Halie's case—he lived just three weeks after I arrival in this city.

The Doctor was most facturate in the selection of his traeing companion or attendant, Mr. T. W. Cook, who wmost devoted and unremitting in his attentions, almocontinually at his bedside during the day, and within it
